Southern Teachers is assisting in St. Anne’s-Belfield School’s search for a Director of STEM, Innovation, and Design to create a nationally recognized program that will equip students to be leaders in rigorous liberal arts college programs and in a technologically connected world. In this hybrid administrative and teaching position, the Director will embrace and model a culture of innovation and evolution in curriculum and instruction that is consistent with the school’s tradition of teaching and learning excellence.

The Director, through a collaborative process, will reimagine a STEM program that integrates curricular and co-curricular offerings in a transdisciplinary manner and will lead cross-disciplinary, multi-discipline faculty groups in building integrated, innovative programming. The Director will be a thought partner for faculty and a thought leader in the field of education and workforce development. The Director will facilitate learning through projects, exhibitions, and competitions during the school year and summer; teach introductory computer and data science classes; and manage budgets, spaces, and personnel.

The ideal candidate will have experience creating a vision, producing sustainable outcomes, and developing programs in which children create, learn, and build. Through education and professional experience, he or she will bring a thorough understanding of engineering, computer science, and robotics and be a builder of innovative approaches to identifying and solving problems with a focus on providing learning opportunities for students. Candidates must hold degrees in related fields and have the management acumen to bring a vision to life in a school setting. Integrity, humility, humor, and curiosity are all required.

Founded in 1910, St. Anne’s-Belfield serves approximately 850 students in grades pre-kindergarten through twelve. Adults in the community strive to support the whole learner—body, heart, mind, and soul—so that students become exemplary citizens and visionary leaders.
